

The Blind Men and The Elephant

Six blind men from Indostan visit an elephant to understand its nature, each one touching a different part of the creature: one encountered its sturdy side and likened it to a wall, another felt the sharp tusk and compared it to a spear, a third encountered the winding trunk and likened it to a snake, another felt the thick tail and thought it was a rope, yet another touched the leg and thought it was a tree, while the last felt the flapping ear and thought it was a fan. They argue fiercely about their interpretations until they realize that they are all partly right and partly wrong.
